While much critical attention has focused on Japanese fishing practices lately in films such as The Cove and At the Edge of the World (which screens at Vancity Theatre next week), a presentation by the Wild Salmon Circle will turn attention to Norway's domination of B.C. salmon farms and problems associated with the industry.

Watch the trailer for "Farmed Salmon Exposed".

"Farmed Salmon Exposed", a 20-minute documentary by Damien Gillis, will be screened tonight (November 12) at 7 p.m. at the SFU Segal Centre (Room 1500, 500 Granville Street, tickets $10). The film includes footage from Canada, Chile, Ireland, Scotland, and Norway. It also explores a possible link between the startling drop of this year's Fraser River sockeye and salmon farms. (This is something that was also suggested by fish biologist Stan Proboszcz in an interview with the Straight. As you can see by the comments left by readers, there's quite a debate about this topic.)

The screening be followed by a panel discussion with former Social Credit environment minister Rafe Mair, Chief Robert Joseph of the Broughton Archipelago Territory, UBC Fisheries Centre biologist Pablo Trujillo, and Gillis.

Afterwards, there'll be a chance for interested attendees to participate in a letter writing campaign.
